Nice lead

My father, Frank Moore, just inherited a mahogany table, with six matching chairs, from his late father Gene Moore. My father is the youngest of his five sons. The table actually stayed with my grandmother Katharine, until she died, a year after her husband. When my father joins the dead, the table will be given to my brother Aaron, his only son. A wish I could inherit the table because it is elegant looking and I know it will hold all of memories.

great descriptive word Diana

While in my grandparent's possession, the table was of course in their dining room. Nowadays, it's hard to think of a family that would now ^{term by up to} have more than six chairs at their table, but the Moore's did. There were eight kids and two adults, that's ten people - ^{your right} five more than the table is fit to hold. A good memory of my father is having a ham for dinner every Sunday after church.

Another great lead

The table is now in my dining room. We eat at it every night though we don't have ham on Sunday. It is very important to me and my family, because it is a link to my deceased relatives.

Excellent way to close Diana
